Terrorist organizations receive billions of dollars of support from states, organizations and individuals. But those who supply this funding are rarely prosecuted successfully.

We can change that – by changing the law and supporting the passage of the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act.

This bill is expected to be introduced shortly in the House of Commons. It will allow Canadian terror victims to launch civil suits against state and local sponsors of terror in Canadian courts.

Civil suits of this sort can hold terror sponsors accountable by allowing seizure of their assets; exposing them to public scrutiny and preventing them from accessing Canada’s financial system.

Prime Minister Harper, MPs from all parties, and leading Canadian jurists have supported the passage of this type of legislation.
